PREFACE

THIS handbook is intended to perform the same service for Latin that some books on homonyms already do for several modern languages, notably French.

The homonyms are arranged in an alphabetical list. Care has been taken not to enter in it any group of homonyms whose actual use by the authors mentioned on the title page could not be proved. The many references that the list contains are inserted as evidence in support of this actual usage.

In such an uninflectional language as English, a list of homonyms collected by looking over the leading words in a dictionary would not be altogether incomplete. This is because English case-forms are mostly alike, and because several of the persons of the English verb are identical in form. On this account a list of homonyms, such as that contained in Professor Skeat's Etymological Dictionary, is tolerably exhaustive, although taking into account only the nominative singular of nouns and the infinitive form of verbs. Yet there are many words such as feed, dove, stove, rung, cooler, lives, leaves, and does which are of quite common occurrence, but which would escape notice as words of double meaning if looked for under the form in which they are usually given in English dictionaries.

This is still more the case in a highly inflected language like Latin. Here the dictionary, giving, as it often does, but a single form or a very few forms for each word, would afford only an imperfect means of discovering the homonyms of the language. Examining the nominative singular of nouns and the first person present indicative of verbs, we should arrive at but very few of the homonyms that Latin possesses. Yet these are often the only forms given in Latin dictionaries. Working in this way, we should never find such groups of homonyms as are made by the words cūstōdī, mātūrā, pūgnās, statuam, or verris. The only method of discovering the existence of such homonyms in a Latin author is to consider the entire range of his vocabulary.

In the Latin that has come down to us, by no means every word is completely inflected. This is, of course, largely due to accident. But an author may also use one member of a group of homonyms while he consciously avoids the others. Again it may happen from some cause that all the members are unused and, in so far, imaginary. These two kinds, the (1) incomplete and the (2) unused groups, should evidently not be placed in the same list with groups of homonyms whose use is thoroughly established.

This is not because they would be altogether valueless to the student of Latin. A list of the words that an author might employ, but does not make use of, may be of considerable interest. What he avoids is almost as instructive as what he chooses. But the two lists should certainly not be merged.

Therefore, beginning at p. 1 in this book, a separate list has been made of the instances where one of a possible pair of homonyms occurs in actual use, but lacks its counterpart. These incomplete, or unmated, homonyms are put at the lower part of the page and described in the briefest manner possible.

The main space above them is occupied by the regular alphabetical list of complete groups. Each member of such a group is given a separate number to distinguish it. This is followed by its case or tense, as it may be, the word from which it comes, and its translation. The translation is, however, merely for the purpose of identifying the homonym. It must not be supposed that it will exactly suit every passage in which the word occurs.

The different classes of homonyms are discussed in the Introduction at pp. xix-xxxi. The word homonym is there taken in its most general sense. But in the alphabetical lists this sense of the word has had to be, to some extent, restricted. To have inserted all kinds of homonyms in the lists, would have made the book too large, and not appreciably increased its usefulness. The selection that it contains is made on the lines of certain natural classes, into which homonyms fall. By this means it is thought that none of the more interesting ones have been omitted.

Class I. (described on pp. xix-xxiv), where the homonyms are inflectional variations of the same word, has been entirely omitted (with the exception of some words noticed in Appendix A., pp. 173-177).

Class II. (described on pp. xxv-xxviii), where the homonyms are different words, but derived from the same stem, has been in part listed and in part omitted. This class falls naturally into a number of subdivisions. Those that have been inserted in the list are instances where :—

- (1) A noun or adjective becomes a preposition.
- (2) A noun or adj. becomes a noun (with a different nom.).
- (3) A noun, adj., or pronoun becomes a conjunction.
- (4) A pronoun becomes an adverb.

Class III. (described on pp. xxix–xxxi), where the homonyms are derived from different stems or roots, is listed in its entirety. This class forms the larger part of the whole list and by far its most important part.

One member of a group of homonyms may be some very common word. Then only its first few occurrences are referred to in the list. The remaining ones are denoted by the sign +. In case the word is rarely used the references given are exhaustive, provided they are less than six or eight in the author considered.

The complete works of each author have been examined for homonyms, except in the case of Cicero and Livy. For Cicero the field comprises the orations only, and for Livy the earlier books (I. to XXII.). The rest of these two authors, except very small portions of Cicero, are much more rarely read. To insert the homonyms contained in them would seem to justify taking into consideration Ovid, Plautus, and others, and extending the book beyond intended limits.

In the case of most of the authors, the references are made to their books in the order in which these usually stand in complete editions. Thus the references to Caesar come first from the Gallic War; then from the Civil, Alexandrine, African, and Spanish in the order named. In Cicero, Vergil, and Tacitus, however, the references are taken from their works in the order in which these are customarily read. Thus in Cicero the references given come first from the four Catilines, then from the Archias and Manilian Law, and finally from the other orations in their order as usually edited. The references to Vergil begin with the Aeneid, and go then to the shorter poems; those of Tacitus begin with the shorter works, and afterward go to the Annals and Histories.

In making these lists of homonyms, it may be that the search for them has been carried over rarely read parts of authors, but if this is so it is only to render the lists more scientifically complete. Valuable corroboration has been gained from the indexes of Merguet for Cicero and Caesar, of Keller and Holder for Horace, and of Gerber and Greef for Tacitus. None of these are without occasional inaccuracies among the large number of references they contain. Nor can it be hoped that the present lists are better in this regard. Their maker will be completely satisfied if errors appear in them in no larger measure.

INTRODUCTION

HOMONYMS IN GENERAL

SYNONYMS are words of the same meaning, but of different form. Homonyms are words of the same form, but of different meaning.

Synonyms are, however, not so much in need of definition. As compared with homonyms, more has been written about them, and they have long been given an important rank in the study of language. They were carefully investigated by Prodicus as early as the fifth century B.C., and Plato represents him discussing them in the salon of Callias before an applauding audience. Crabbe's collection of synonyms for English, Döderlein's for Latin, and Schmidt's for Greek are extensive works. But similar books on homonyms are noticeably lacking. This is certainly not because a knowledge of these words lacks practical usefulness. Homonyms are indeed in any language the most troublesome words for a beginner. It is through them that his most ridiculous mistakes arise. Yet, with all the dangers that may come from the misuse of homonyms, the books that treat of them are extremely few.

The French seem in fact the only Europeans who are at all well equipped with literature on this subject. A work by Philipou de la Madelaine, Des Homonymes, and another by Prosper Poitevin, Homonymes Français, have each gone through several editions. This greater interest in homonyms among the French is because French is a language especially replete with these words. The frequency of silent letters in this language causes many of its words to have the same sound, although quite a different spelling.

For English, there is a list of homonyms covering some pages in the appendix of Professor Skeat's Etymological Dictionary. A short list of Latin homographs (one kind of homonym) is given in Bouterwek and Tegge's Altsprachliche Orthographie. Otherwise, the subject of homonyms is usually relegated to articles in encyclopaedias and to stray paragraphs in books on rhetoric and grammar.

TREATMENT OF HOMONYMS BY GREEK AND LATIN WRITERS

The present scarcity of literature upon the subject of homonyms is certainly not caused by any lack of recognition of these words in antiquity, nor because the word homonym is of recent origin. In the Homeric poems the two Ajaxes are called "homonyms" of each other. Plato employs the word several times to denote things having the same name. With him comes also the added meaning of false representation, as in the words, "They are imitations and homonyms of the things that really exist" (Soph. 234 B).

The adjective synonymous (συνώνυμος), not found in Homer or Plato, seems to occur first in the tragic poets. In them it has the same sense as its brother word ὁμώνυμος. Aristotle, however, who carefully defines the two terms, finds a considerable difference between them. Yet with him the two are such favorite words that in his frequent use of them he does not always hold himself strictly bound by his own definitions.

The term homonym is thus explained by Aristotle in the opening sentence of his first book (Cat. 1): Ὁμώνυμα λέγεται ὧν ὄνομα μόνον κοινόν, ὃ δὲ κατὰ τοῦνομα λόγος τῆς οὐσίας ἕτερος, οἷον ζῶον ὃ τε ἄνθρωπος καὶ τὸ γεγραμμένον, τούτων γὰρ ὄνομα μόνον κοινόν, ὃ δὲ κατὰ τοῦνομα λόγος τῆς οὐσίας ἕτερος· ἂν γάρ τις ἀποδιδῷ τί ἐστιν αὐτῶν ἑκατέρῳ, τὸ ζῶον εἶναι, ἴδιον ἑκατέρου λόγον ἀποδώσει. — “Homonyms are defined as objects which have only their name in common, but the definition of their real substance different, as for instance, ζῶον denotes man and a picture (of one). Of these the name only is common; but the definition of the real substance is different. If a person attaches to each of them the quality that makes it a ζῶον, he will attach its proper definition to each.”

Synonyms he defines in the sentence immediately following this definition of the homonym: Συνώνυμα δὲ λέγεται ὧν τό τε ὄνομα κοινόν καὶ ὃ κατὰ τοῦνομα λόγος τῆς οὐσίας ὁ αὐτός, οἷον ζῶον ὃ τε ἄνθρωπος καὶ ὁ βοῦς. — “Synonyms are defined as objects which have their name in common, and of which the definition of the real substance is the same: as ζῶον denotes man and ox.”

In these rather formal definitions, Aristotle is regarding homonyms and synonyms as objects and not as mere words. Synonyms consequently appear to him as different objects comprised under one class-name. Homonyms, on the other hand, are objects having the same name but not belonging to the same class. Man and ox are synonyms, because they come under the same class-name of animal. Man and his picture are homonyms, because they do not belong structurally in the same class of objects, although in Greek they have the same name, ζῶον. In another passage, Aristotle says in further illustration of this point, "A picture of a physician will not be able to carry on a physician's practice ; it is only a physician homonymically." In the definition of both synonyms and homonyms, Aristotle has thus quite a different point of view from ours.

He, however, employs the modern grammatical sense of these terms, without redefining them, in Rhet. III. 2, 7. Here the homonym and synonym are evidently understood as words. In this passage he puts homonyms among the words that help the sophist in playing his tricks ; synonyms among those that are useful to the poet (τῶν δ' ὀνομάτων τῷ μὲν σοφιστῇ ὁμωνυμῖαι χρήσιμοι, παρὰ ταύτας γὰρ κακουργεῖ, τῷ ποιητῇ δὲ συνωνυμῖαι). As an example of two homonyms of this verbal sort Aristotle gives (Eth. Nic. V. 2) κλείς, meaning either 'key' or 'collar-bone' ; and as an example of two synonyms, the two verbs of motion, πορεύεσθαι and βαδίζειν (Rhet. III. 2, 7).

The later Greek rhetoricians tell us little about homonyms, except that they cause ambiguity (or amphibolia, as it is termed by them). Theon illustrates this figure by the phrase (Spengel, Rh. Gr. II. 129) ἐκ παιδὸς μὴ εἶναι μαρτυρίαν, where a doubt arises whether παιδός means child, or son, or slave. Another of the writers on rhetoric instances ζεύγος βοῶν ἤλαννεν. In this it is doubtful whether βοῶν is intended to mean shouting or of oxen. The ambiguity of homonyms is likewise noticed by Quintilian (Inst. Orat. VII. 9, 2) : singula afferunt errorem cum pluribus rebus aut hominibus eadem appellatio est (ὁμωνυμία δicitur) ut Gallus, avem, an gentem, an nomen, an fortunam corporis significet incertum est.

Under a figure called trāductiō a certain kind of homonym is discussed by the Auctor ad Herennium. His words are (4, 20) :

Trāductiō est quae facit utī cum idem verbum crēbrius pōnātur nōn modo nōn offēdat animum, sed etiam concinniorē orātiōnem reddat hōc pactō: Quī nihil habet in vītā iūcundius vītā is cum virtūte vītā nōn potest colere. — Ex eōdem genere est exōrnātiōnis, cum idem verbum pōnitur modo in hāc modo in alterā rē hōc modō. Cūr eam rem tam studiōsē cūrās quae tibi multās dabit cūrās? Item: Nam amārī iūcundum sit, sī cūrētur nē quid insit amārī. Item: Veniam ad vōs sī mihi senātus det veniam. This trāductiō, therefore, as we see from the instances of it, is formed by a pair of contrasted words. These contrasted words may be of two sorts: (1) differently spelled cases of the same word, or (2) a pair of words alike in spelling and pronunciation, but belonging to different parts of speech. This latter sort evidently consists of true homonyms.

In adnōminātiō, another figure explained by the Auctor (4, 29), the contrasted words differ slightly in pronunciation. Through this difference they become homographs merely, but are not true homonyms. Of this figure, adnōminātiō, the writer says: Ea multis et variis rationibus conficitur. Attenuatione aut complexione eiusdem litterae sic: hic quī sē magnificē iactat atque ostentat venīt antequam Rōmam vēnit. Et ex contrariō sic: hic, quōs hominēs ālea vincit, eōs ferrō statim vincīt. Prōductione eiusdem litterae, hōc modō: hunc avium dulcēdō dūcit ad āvium. Brevitate eiusdem litterae hōc modō: hic tametsī vidētur esse honoris cupidus, tamen nōn tantum cūriam diligit quantum Curiam. Besides these methods of forming adnōminātiō, others cause it, he tells us, by the removal or transposing of letters.

Trāductiō may accordingly consist of contrasting a pair of homonyms within the space of a sentence. Adnōminātiō may be caused by contrasting two homographs in the same way. The recognition of the special kind of words that form these figures is the only point of interest. The figures themselves are of little importance. They are nothing more than an effort to juggle with the materials of language. Quintilian in criticising these passages quoted from the Auctor rightly says (IX. 3, 69), eōrumque exempla vitandī potius quam imitandī grātiā pōnō.

In treating the subject of ambiguity, Quintilian notices that some words can be divided into pieces, and still retain some meaning.¹ As Latin examples of such words he gives ingenua, armāmentum, incultō, and others. These are, however, not at all ambiguous in our printed texts. They become so only when written in the ancient way, without spacing of words, or when read in a monotone.

HOMONYMS IN ENGLISH AND IN KINDRED MODERN LANGUAGES

Before considering in detail the homonyms of Latin, it may be useful to examine this feature in English and incidentally in some other languages. For, as regards the formation of homonyms, the classic languages exhibit poverty beside the richness of French and English. In these languages not only is each class of homonyms more fully represented, but the sources of the homonyms themselves are more interestingly divergent. Even a very brief examination of English suffices to show that :—

I. Some words are homonyms both to the eye and to the ear. Examples of these would be bear, the verb, and bear, the noun ; or cleave, ‘to adhere,’ and cleave, ‘to cut asunder.’

II. Other homonyms may be spelled alike, but differ in pronunciation ; as, gill, a measure, and gill, part of a fish ; or lead, the metal, and lead, the verb. A better term to use for such words is homograph. They are especially frequent in languages, like French and English, where the spelling is unphonetic.

III. A third class of homonyms is composed of words that are pronounced alike, but which differ in spelling. Such words are homonyms to the ear only and not to the eye. These sound-homonyms, or homophones, are common enough in English. The words, meat, meet, mete ; or right, rite, wright, write, are good examples ; and dialect peculiarities or carelessness in pronunciation may greatly increase their number.

These various kinds of homonyms have usually arisen by assimilation to one another of words that were different in earlier ages. Often also the original words come from widely separated sources. Thus in a group of English homonyms, one may be of Celtic origin, one of Teutonic, and another may come from Latin or some other language. An example of this would be lay, the present tense of one Anglo-Saxon verb, the past of another ; lay, ‘a song,’ from Old French, and lay, ‘not clerical,’ from Greek. Moor, ‘to fasten,’ comes (probably) from Dutch, moor, ‘a plain,’ from Anglo-Saxon, and Moor, ‘an African,’ from Greek. Homophones and homographs are even more likely to be derived in this way from different sources than are the pure homonyms just given. Thus, to instance a set of homophones, fane is from Latin fānum, fain from Anglo-Saxon fægen, and feign from Latin fingō. The homograph slough, 'a mire,' comes from Celtic; but slough, 'a cast skin,' from some Germanic source.

In other instances, all the members of a group of homonyms may be derived from one ancestral language. Thus the various meanings of port (demeanor, harbor, gate, a wine) come more or less directly from the Latin words portāre, portus, and porta. The various meanings of ear, 'organ of hearing,' 'head of grain,' 'to plough,' are from different Anglo-Saxon words. Bay, 'a color'; bay, 'a division of a wall'; bay, 'an inlet'; and bay, 'a barking,' are from different Latin words. The homophones too and two are from Anglo-Saxon; vain and vein are from Latin. The homographs mow, 'to cut,' and mow, 'a heap,' are of Anglo-Saxon origin.

The other Germanic languages as compared with English are relatively free from homonyms. They have, in the first place, less intermixture and assimilation of foreign words. Besides this, they have to a greater degree than English a trait that was also possessed by Latin and Greek, — phonetic spelling. That is, they usually render the same sound by the same letter or the same combination of letters. Sein, 'his,' and sein, 'to be'; der Bauer, das Bauer; and der Trug, er trug, are common homonyms from German. Homophones are exemplified by mehr, Meer; Seite, Saite; and heute, Häute; and homographs by a shift of accent, as in einmál and einmal.

French and, to a less extent, the other Romance languages show the effect of considerable assimilation. This has taken place both in sound and spelling during their descent from their parent Latin speech. Thus son from Latin suus, son from Latin sonus, and son, 'bran,' from Latin summus (?) have come to coincide in French. These form a set of pure homonyms. Homographs like *fil*s from filius, and *fil*s from filum, or vis from vīvō, and vis from vītis, show like assimilations. As long as Latin retained its inflectional endings and its almost completely phonetic spelling, it was necessarily less rich than French in homonyms of all kinds. Latin is, for instance, utterly unable to furnish such a group of homophones; as the French words, lai, laid, laie, lait, lé, legs, les, and lez; as, ceins, ceint, cing, sain, saint, sein, seing, sin; or as, vair, ver, verre, vers, and vert.

Modern Greek has also a large number of homophones that are not found in the ancient language. These have been produced, however, not so much by silencing consonants after the manner of French, as by assimilating the sounds of several vowels and diphthongs. In this way, η, ι, υ, ει, υι, οι have come to represent but a single sound, that of English long e. Consequently, such ancient Greek words as, ειη, iei, ιη, ιoi οiei, οιη, οιι, υiei, υiei, υιι, υoi would all be homophones in the modern speech.

HOMONYMS IN LATIN

As previously stated, Latin spelling was almost completely phonetic. No languages have a spelling entirely so. In all of them some letters or letter-combinations are found whose sounds are very similar or even exactly the same. Yet, as far as the pronunciation of Latin can now be determined, there were very few such cases among its elementary sounds. Much alike in sound were e and ei, and ae seems to have coincided with them from the Augustan period onward. The aspirated mutēs, ph, ch, th, were closely like the corresponding surds, p, c, t; bs was like ps. But these and various other rare combinations merely give rise to a varied spelling of the same word; e.g., caelum, coelum; trophaeum, tropēum. They do not produce any homophones, at least in the literary language.¹ Consequently, for all practical purposes Latin may be regarded as a phonetically spelled language, and the presence in it of homophones may be safely denied.

But, although homophones do not appear in Latin, such is not the case with homographs. The latter are frequent and form interesting groups. A pair of such Latin homographs, though they have the same spelling, always differ in the quantity of one or more of their vowels. An example would be parere, 'to produce,' and pārēre, 'to obey'; or sedēs, 'you sit,' and sēdēs, 'seat.' These differences in quantity (although much neglected by moderns in their pronunciation of Latin) were without doubt carefully brought out by the Romans. Failure to distinguish in this way homographs that differ in the quantity of the ultima or the antepenult, is a serious error. Much worse is it, however, when the quantity of the penult syllable is concerned; for it may then, in addition to a false quantity, give rise to a false accent.²

² Some Latin teachers who have spent decades in their profession do not correctly differentiate cupidō from cupidō. It would be interesting to find out how many surely know which it is, and what difference it makes, whether it is abūtēris or abūteris, that is found at the opening of Cicero's First Catiline.

I. HOMONYMS FORMED BY THE INFLECTION OF A SINGLE WORD

In the sense in which the word homonym is used in modern languages, it is usually understood that each member of a group of homonyms comes from a different root. This limitation in the meaning of the word could also be carried out in Latin. But in a discussion that aims to cover, to a degree, all the phases of the subject, it seems better at first to understand the word in its widest sense. By this means there can be taken into consideration two new classes (I., II.) which would otherwise have to be omitted. One of these classes (I.) comprises homonyms which are derived from the same word. These may, of course, differ, as nouns in case or number; as adjectives and pronouns in case, number, or gender; or as verbs in person, tense, mood, or voice. In short, the definition of homonym as thus extended includes such forms of the same word as are duplicated in the course of its inflection. Examples of these coinciding forms are found scattered through all the regular declensions and conjugations, as follows:—

The declensions of adjectives and participles are the same as the first three declensions of nouns. The masculine and neuter genders always follow the second or third declension. The feminine generally follows the first. In all cases, however, any one gender always holds to a single declension. Consequently within any one gender the coincidences in form are never more numerous than those of a similarly declined noun of one of the first three declensions.

The following additional coincidences are found on comparing the different genders of adjectives with one another : —

¹ The preceding outline comprises practically all the homonyms of class I. So familiar are they that their various coincidences are illustrated by merely a single example of some typical Latin word. A few coincidences owing to their rarity have not been inserted in this outline. They are explained in Appendix A., pp. 173-177. As far as they are found in actual use, they are also given in the regular list of homonyms that begins on p. I.

II. HOMONYMS THAT ARE DIFFERENT WORDS BUT DERIVED FROM THE SAME STEM

Another class of homonyms is that in which each member of a group is derived from the same stem but belongs to a different part of speech. English and other modern languages are as well equipped with this sort of homonym as Latin. Brown, a color; brown, possessing that color; brown, to make have that color; pouvoir, le pouvoir; das Bitten, wir bitten; gut, 'good,' gut, 'well,' Gut, 'estate,' are examples of modern words thus derived from the same stem.

In Latin, homonyms of this sort would be adversus, the participle 'opposite,' and adversus, the preposition and adverb 'against'; malum, the adjective 'bad,' malum, the noun 'badness,' and malum, the interjection 'the deuce'; causa, the noun 'cause,' and causā, the preposition 'on account of'; commodum, the adjective 'convenient,' and commodum, the adverb 'just now.'

A frequent change of this sort, from one part of speech to another, takes place whenever an adjective is used as a noun or pronoun. Although this is common enough in English (where it is found in such phrases as, 'the good,' 'the many,' 'a following'), it is still more widely used in Latin. In many cases we can arrive at the meaning of the noun thus formed by supplying to the meaning of the adjective the concepts, man, woman, or thing, according as the gender of the derivative noun is masculine, feminine, or neuter. Thus, by knowing the meaning of the participle or adjective, we arrive easily at the meaning of nātus, 'son,' nāta, 'daughter,' praefectus, 'leader,' factum, 'deed,' dēcrētum, 'decree,' iūssa, 'commands,' bona,

'goods,' prōmissa, 'promises,' propinquus, 'relative,' dīva, 'goddess,' amīcus, 'friend.'

In other instances the meaning of the derivative noun does not come so simply from the adjective. The notion of man, woman, or thing, primarily suggested by the gender of the noun, is not enough. In changing to a noun the adjective has received some more remote or peculiar noun-idea. Thus with fera the noun bēstia seems to be implied, with pauca the noun verba, with rēgia the noun domus, and with patria the word terra.

Instances where, conversely, a noun is used as an adjective, are much more rare. Examples of this usage are lupī raptōrēs or victor exercitus. This use is so uncommon that, in fact, it becomes a figure of speech rather than a regular form of expression. Although usually found in poetry or in passages of poetic coloring, the second example of the two just given is from the prosaic Caesar.

The derived noun (or adjective) that was discussed in the last two paragraphs had the same set of forms as the word from which it came. In some instances, however, the derived word has taken on a different nominative. This is seen on comparing the nouns, animal and cōgnōmen, with their corresponding adjectives, animālis and cōgnōminis. These pairs have the same stem, and in all cases except the nominative and accusative singular the noun coincides with the neuter of the adjective. The two nouns, mālus, 'apple tree,' and mālum, 'apple,' have a similar relation to each other. Leaving aside the question of priority between such words, the fact seems to remain that they separated at an earlier stage in the formation of the language than those words which have the same nominative.

From the point of view of classic Latin they are distinctly independent words.

Another frequent change from one part of speech to another consists in the use of an adjective, noun, or pronoun as an adverb. In English this transfer can be seen in far and daily, the adjectives; in why and that, the pronouns; and in post, the noun (in such a phrase as 'to travel post'). Latin examples of this change to an adverb would be extrēmum, quō, and curriculō. The accusative singular neuter of the adjective is indeed the only form used in making the adverb of the comparative degree (celerius, 'faster'). In the positive degree the adverb is more variously formed. The ablative of the adjective, as, e.g., certō, is very commonly used. Many adverbs from nouns and pronouns are also made in this way, as forte, quō. Fewer adverbs, but certain ones of very frequent occurrence, are made from the accusative, as multum, facile. This usage extends also into the superlative degree (as, e.g., in prīmum), but here the ablative (as in prīmō) is about as common.

The converse change from an adverb to an adjective may also be traced in Latin; as, for example, in the phrases, sī valēs bene est or erī semper lēnitās. It can be paralleled in English by 'often infirmities.'

Besides the changes already mentioned, Latin exhibits several others more rare and accidental. One of these is the change from an adjective or noun to a preposition. An example of this would be secundum, circum, or causā in Latin, or round and midst in English. The change of a noun, adjective, or pronoun to a conjunction is another transfer. Modo, cēterum, vērūm, or quod would represent this in Latin, and English examples would be the pronoun that and the adjective both.

Furthermore, words that have the force of an interjection, like pāx, quid, or malum, may be derived from a noun, pronoun, or adjective. These may be paralleled by such words as silence, why, or wonderful in English.

Case forms and declinable words entered into the transfers just considered. But there are still others where verbs and particles are concerned, and which are perhaps less noticeable. Thus a verb may appear to be used as a noun, as in amābō; as a conjunction, as in licet; or as an interjection, as in age. Similar words in English would be rise, except, and halt.

The same word may also be used at one time as an adverb, and at another time as a conjunction. This is shown in the two meanings 'or' and 'certainly,' for vel, or in the meanings 'how' and 'that' for ut. An adverb and a preposition may also be the same word; as, contrā, 'on the other hand,' and contrā, 'against'; or propter, 'near,' and propter, 'on account of.' Three of these uses are found in the English since, and the adverb-preposition use is shown in down or through. Finally, a preposition and a conjunction seem to be combined in cum (compare English for), and a preposition and an interjection in prō; but it is more than likely that these words are from different roots, and so do not belong under this head.

In brief, then, homonyms of class II. are formed whenever—

- (1) An adj. becomes a noun (or pronoun), or the converse.
- (2) A noun, pron., or adj. becomes an adverb, or the converse.
- (3) A noun or adjective becomes a preposition.
- (4) A noun, pronoun, or adjective becomes a conjunction.
- (5) A noun, pronoun, or adjective becomes an interjection.
- (6) A verb becomes a noun, conjunction, or interjection.
- (7) An adverb becomes a preposition or conjunction.

III. HOMONYMS DERIVED FROM DIFFERENT STEMS OR ROOTS

In class III. the members of any group of homonyms must necessarily come from different stems, although their root may be the same. Whenever they are derived in this way from the same root, they will all have a kindred meaning. This is shown in the three senses of 'honor,' 'honorable,' and 'you honor,' that are attached to the group of homonyms spelled honestās. Another instance of homonyms of kindred meaning is shown in decōrī from decor, decōrī from decōrus, and decorī from decus. Quite a number of small families of homonyms are thus formed from a single root. A set of three members, as in the examples just cited, is, however, much less frequent than a group of two.

When each member of a group of homonyms comes from a different root, there is much greater difference in their meanings. An example of this from English would be cleave, or lay, or in fact any of the homonyms mentioned on page xvii. An illustration from Latin would be malīs, 'bad,' mālīs, 'you may prefer,' mālīs, 'cheeks,' and mālīs, 'masts.' When homonyms show such different meanings as these, it seems to be owing to accidental likenesses among their roots. Fortunately, these homonyms are more rare than the other kinds we have discussed. But they are also the most important for the reader to recognize. To mistake one of them for another, when they have so different senses, completely distorts the meaning of a passage in which they may be used.

In this class III. some homonyms may happen to have the same stem-ending and inflection, though coming from different roots. An example of this would be incīdō, 'I cut in,' and incidō, 'I fall in'; or iūs, 'right,' and iūs, 'gravy.' All the forms of one of these words will then have corresponding forms in the other.¹

When the stem-endings or inflections are different, coincidences in form are much more restricted. This holds true whether the homonyms are from the same root, like the words spelled honestās, or from different roots, like those spelled malīs. Coincidences among such homonyms can occur only in certain special lines where the same endings happen to be found. This similarity of ending is found between words of the Third and fifth declension in -ēs, as in fidēs; -em, as in fidem; and -e, as in fīde (fidē).

¹ Some peculiar homonyms formed by the prefix in- and by the suffix -que also correspond in this way.

In- is used with participles, (1) in the same sense as the preposition in, or (2) with the meaning 'not.' In this way there may arise pairs of homonyms in which one member of the pair is of almost opposite meaning to the other; as, indicēns, 'declaring,' and indicēns, 'not declaring.'

The suffix -que is attached, with a distributive meaning, to interrogative pronouns and a few other words. The same suffix may also have the meaning 'and.' Pairs of homonyms can thus be formed by whatever words allow this -que to be attached to them in either of its senses. Such a pair is, e.g., cuique, meaning 'to each,' and cuique, meaning 'and to whom.'

First declension and a verb in -a, as in fīrma (fīrmā); -am, as in vīvam; -is, as in scrībīs (scrībīs); and -ās, as in vīvās.

Second declension and a verb in -er, as in liber; -ī, as in lūdī; -ō, as in lūdō; -e, as in lūde; -a, as in rēgna (rēgnā); and -is, as in lūdīs (lūdīs).

Fourth declension and a verb in -uī, as in metuī.

Fifth declension and a verb in -ēs, as in fidēs (fīdēs); -em, as in lūxuriem; and -e, as in fīdē (fīdē).

First and second conjugation in -ēs, -et, -ēmus, -ētis, -ent, and -ētur; as, for example, in parō and pāreō.

First and third conjugation in twenty-four different forms, as a comparison of dicō and dīcō shows.

First conjugation and -iō verbs in -ere and -eris, as in parēre (parere) and parēris (pareris).

Second and third conjugation in thirty-seven different forms, as a comparison of īnsīdeō and īnsīdō shows.

Second conjugation and -iō verbs in -e, -ere, -erētur, and in the whole of the impf. subj. act., as a comparison of iaceō and iaciō shows.

Second, third, and fifth declensions and an adverb in -e, as in cāre (cārē), arte (artē), or seriē (sēriē).

Verbs and an adverb in -e, as in manē (māne), ōrnāte (ōrnātē), or tenēre (tenerē).

APPENDIX

A. ADDITIONAL HOMONYMS FORMED BY THE INFLECTION OF A SINGLE WORD

IN the Introduction, pp. xix-xxiv, instances are given where forms are duplicated in the course of the inflection of ordinary Latin words. These are all standard, classical forms and are most of them in common use. All other instances of duplication of form within the inflection of a word, that are not thus outlined in the Introduction, have been entered in the Alphabetical List, pp. 1-172. This is, of course, provided that they are found in actual use. These smaller groups of coinciding forms generally contain some earlier or more unusual word-form. The groups themselves may be conveniently shown in a tabular arrangement as follows: —

PRONOUNS

In pronouns and pronominal adjectives there are various other duplications in form besides those outlined in the Introduction, pp. xxi-xxii, under the head of adjectives and pronouns. These exceptional cases of coincidence have also been inserted in the Alphabetical List. This will account for the presence in this list of such forms as, nūllī, dat. sing., and nūllī, nom. pl. m.; mē, the acc., and mē, the abl. sing.; sibī, the dat. sing., and sibī, the dat. pl.; quae, the nom. sing. f., nom., acc. pl. n., and quae, the nom. pl. f.; hōc, nom. and acc. sing. n., and hōc, abl. sing. m. and n. These are instances where pronouns vary from the declension of the standard adjectives. They are of course very common words, but they have been entered in the list as being practically isolated instances of duplication, or as being peculiar to only a very few pronouns. Like these pronouns in their isolation are ambō and duō; so that a few coincidences peculiar to these two adjectives have been also listed.

VERBS

Some groups and pairs of homonyms, that are produced within the inflection of a verb by a form from one of its systems coinciding with a form from another, are outlined in the Introduction, pp. xxiii, xxiv. These pairs comprise far the greater number of such cases of coincidence. Other pairs that are formed more rarely are entered in the Alphabetical List as far as they occur in actual use. These rarer coinciding forms are likewise found at certain regular places in the verb-inflection, which it may be interesting to specify.

PRESENT AND PERFECT SYSTEMS

In the first conj. coincidences between these systems can occur in only two places, and they are also practically limited to the one verb iuvō. In this verb the two pres. subj. pass. forms, iuvēris, iuvēre, form two pairs of homonyms (or more strictly homographs) with the pf. and fut. pf. ind. act. forms, iūvēre and iūveris.

The second conj. has the same two pairs in a few of its verbs. Generally the stem-vowel is lengthened in the pf. so that two pairs of homographs arise. This is seen on comparing vidēris and vidēre with vīderis and vīdēre. One pair of homonyms and one pair of homographs would on the other hand be produced by such a verb as respondēō, whose stem-vowel remains unchanged. The second conj. differs from the first in that its two forms from the present stem are not from the subj., but from the ind., impv., and inf. Coincidences between the present and pf. system are thus rather more frequent in the second than in the first conj.

In the third conj. the groups of homonyms that may arise are five in number. They have been already outlined (Introduction, pp. xxiii, xxiv), and form three groups of pure homonyms and two of homographs. In a few verbs the stem-vowel of the pf. is lengthened and then all five groups become homographs as, for example, in emō or legō. These homographs, such as emit, ēmit; legere, lēgēre, have been given a place in the list. The coincidences of verbs whose stem is unchanged in the pf. as, for example, those of contendō, have been omitted, because these verbs are so much more numerous.

Two -iō verbs of the third conj., fodiō and fugiō, also make sets of homographs like emō. They differ, however, from it in that their fut. pf. (fōderis) and pf. (fōdēre) coincide with their pres. ind. and impv. pass. only (foderis, -re), and not with their fut. ind. pass. (fodiēris, -re). In a verb like emō all these forms would have the same spelling.

In the fourth conj. comperiō (the late odiō) and veniō are the only verbs in which forms from the present and the perfect system coincide. Veniō (and odiō) supplies three pairs of homographs venī vēnī, venit vēnit, venīmus vēnimus. Comperiō, having its stem unchanged, gives pure homonyms in the first two pairs and a homograph in the last.

The third conj. thus shows the greatest number of coincidences, namely five, between its present and its perfect system. The fourth conj. comes next with three. The first and second conjs. follow with two each. The five pairs of coinciding forms of the third conj. show the five different endings -ī, -it, -imus, -ēre (-ere) and -eris (-ēris). Verbs of the other conjs. show no other endings, but merely share these with one another. The first and second conjs. each take -ēre and -eris (-ēris). The fourth conj. takes the remaining three, -ī, -it, and -imus (-imus).

The forms of the perfect system usually have one fixed way in which they are spelled. In some instances, however, a pf. that regularly ends its stem with a v may omit this v and contract the resulting adjacent vowels. A common instance of this, with the ending -(v)eris, is given in the Introduction, p. xxiv. Besides this instance, the īv-pfs. (fourth, rarely third conj.) may allow other contracted forms which are homonymous with presents. Petī, petīt, and petīmus are examples of such pfs., which by contraction thus come to coincide with forms from the present system.

PRESENT AND SUPINE SYSTEMS

The most frequent coincidences between the present and supine system are those that were noticed at p. xxiv of the Introduction. These were made by verbs of the first conj. whose supines end in -ātum and by verbs of the fourth conj. whose supines end in -ītum. A few irregularities among these conjs. perhaps deserve a passing notice. Dō makes the same sets of homonyms as the other verbs of the first conj., except that its a-vowel is short where theirs is long. Itum (from eō), on the other hand, with like shortening of its vowel in the sup. and sciō scite, with shortened vowel in the impv., do not act like audiō, since, with other similarly spelled forms of the pres. of eō and pf. pt. of sciō, they form homographs only. The compounds of -ciō, as accīō, excīō, etc., in their coinciding forms may be regarded as following audiō. Such a pt. as excitus may be regarded as from the second conj. verb cieō, and accordingly will not form any coincidences with its own pres. Pōtō is unique in forming homonym-groups with the forms pōtō, pōtās, pōtā. Such forms as pōtātis, pōtāte, or pōtātō on the other hand fail to find any echo in the pt. pōtus, although they can coincide with forms of the alternative pt. pōtātus.

In the second conj. a few verbs whose supines end in -ētum give rise to two pairs of homonyms and one pair of homographs, as amō or audiō do. An example of this would be the words dēlēte, dēlēto, and dēlētis (-īs) from dēlēō. Cēnseō, another second conj. verb, is peculiar in allowing a coincidence between its present impv. (cēnsē) and the voc. sing. m. of its pf. pt. (cēnse).

In the third conj. a small group of verbs with sups. in -itum or in ītum coincide as often as audiō. Thus crēdō, which has a sup. in -itum, makes two pairs of homonyms and one pair of homographs, as in crēdite, crēditō, and crēditis (-īs). When the sup. ends in -itum then not merely the last pair, but all three pairs are homographs; as in petite petite, petitō petitō, petitis petitis. Two -iō verbs of the third conj. also allow three coincidences. One of them, cupiō, follows the usage of petō: the other, ēliciō, forms its coincidences after the manner of crēdō.

PERFECT AND SUPINE SYSTEMS

There is but a single place where the perfect and supine systems can have coinciding forms. This is where the ending is -ī. There must also be another condition, namely, that the two systems have the same stem. An instance is clausī, pf. ind. act., and clausī, gen. sing. m. and n., and nom. pl. m. of the pf. pt. of claudō. Verbs that allow this coincidence must have a perfect stem in s or t; for these are the only endings that a supine stem will admit. Usually they are third conj. verbs, like claudō, having an s-pf. The t-pfs. are limited to a few compounds of sistō and stō. The -iō group of the third conj. supplies but a single verb quatiō (in the compounds -cussī) that makes this coincidence between pf. and sup. system. The second and fourth conjs. supply each a few such verbs; as, for example, iubeō and sentiō. The first conj. does not exhibit any.

aequissume, voc. sing. m., is an emendation of Fleckeisen followed by Dziatzko for the Ms. agissime in line 12 (993) of the spurious conclusion of the Andria of Ter. — The adv. aequissimē occurs in Cic. Verr. III. 147.

altitūdine in Sall. H. IV. 55 is understood by Dietsch as a dat., but is better taken by Maurenbrecher as an abl. It is found in the phrase scdlās pārēs moenium altitūdine quoted from Sall. by Arusianus to illustrate the construction pār hāc rē. Being an abl. itself, it of course ceases to be a homonym of this case.

assēdimus, as a verb of the second conj. in Cic. Cluent. 141, is an error found only in Kayser's text for the Ms. assēdissēmus. — As a form of the third conj. from assīdō the word occurs in Cic. Verr. IV. 138.

clāre, voc. sing. m. in Hor. C. I. 20, 5, is defended by Bentley, though it is the reading of very inferior Mss. Keller and Holder and most other editors keep cāre. — Clārē, the adv., occurs in Caes. C. III. 94, in Cic. Verr. II. 94, III. 69, Sulla 31, and in Ter. And. 754.

colligant, as pres. subj., is an alteration made by Nipperdey in an inferior reading colligent of Caes. C. II. 31. Better Mss. have concilient, which is retained by most editors, including Holder and Du Pontet. — Colligant, as pres. ind., is found in Nep. Dion 9, 4.

dēcrēvisse, from dēcrēsco, is an emendation of Kayser in Cic. Sest. 69 for the Ms. crēvisse. Mommsen suggests dēfuisse. — Dēcrēvisse, from dēcernō, is found in Sall. J. 109, 3, in Cic. Verr. II. 174, + (3), and in Tac. A. IV. 43.

immūtātum, pf. pt. of immūtō meaning 'changed,' is Halm's ci. for the Medicean ramūtātum and the mūtātum of other Mss. in Tac. H. II. 100. Heraeus does not adopt this, preferring commūtātum. — Immūtātum, as an adj. meaning 'unchanged,' occurs in Ter. And. 242.

invisīs, 'unseen,' is all that is made by Nipperdey out of the Ms. invislatitatis of Caes. C. II. 4. Elberling followed by Holder and Du Pontet finds invisitātis and there are numerous other conjectures. — As pt. of invidēō, 'hated,' the word is found in Hor. S. II. 3, 262.

relēgit (pf.), defended by Bentley in Hor. E. 2, 69, is a vl. taken from inferior Mss. Keller (Epilog.) thinks that the archetype had redēgit. To this, he concludes, a gloss collēgit was added and from this latter relēgit naturally descended. — The pres. relegit is found in Tac. A. II. 54.

repetitō, fut. impv. act., is an emendation of Fleckeisen in Ter. Ph. 664 for the Ms. petitō. It is approved by Dziatzko and with some doubt by Spengel. — As a pf. pt. repetitō is found in Tac. A. III. 33 and VI. 5.

trānsmīssum, as acc. of a 4th decl. noun, is retained by Holder and other editors of Caes. in G. V. 2. Nipperdey strikes it out as a gloss on the neighboring noun trāiectum. — As pf. pt. trānsmīssum occurs in Tac. A. IV. 21, XVI. 12, and in Liv. XXII. 20, 7.

vade, abl. of vās, is supplied to the text without Ms. authority by Madvig in Cic. Sest. 19, and the change is approved by Kayser as necessary to the sense. — As an impv., vāde is found in Hor. Epl. I. 13, 19.

vādēs, fut. ind. act. of vādō, is a conjecture of Ūsener and Dziatzko followed by Ribbeck in Verg. Cul. 380 for various Ms. readings among which is vādīs the pres. — Vadēs from vās is found in Sall. J. 35, 9 and in Tac. A. I. 60, V. 8. — Vādīs from vādum is found in Hor. E. 16, 26 and frequently in Verg.

verris and vellis are variants of as early a date as the Pseudoakron in Hor. S. II. 3, 235. Bentley prefers the former, but doubtfully. Keller also thinks that it suits the meaning better because 'you sweep' can refer very properly to fishing with a net. He finds it however in the Mss. of his class III., while vellis is in classes I. and II. — As gen. sing. of verrēs 'boar,' the word is found in Hor. C. III. 22, 7.
